Nursing, COVID and the end of resilience: A critical approach

by Michael Traynor

A review by Grace Cook

As an advocate for ecological resilience and the importance of communities and systems in response to adversity I was really interested in reading this book.

Art of Nursing webinar

24 September 2025: Novel nurses

This webinar brings together nurses who write novels. They share examples of their work and together discuss why they write fiction and how being a nurse helps. Should be a fascinating conversation.

The role of leadership in enhancing crisis management and emergency preparedness in independent care homes

Melissa Stanton is inviting you to take part in a research study she is conducting at Anglia Ruskin University. The study will explore how registered nurses in registered manager roles led independent care homes during the COVID-19 pandemic. The study aims to identify effective leadership strategies and challenges in crisis management and emergency preparedness, with the hope of informing future leadership training and policy.

Sorted: an experimental interpretive poetry piece on injectable medications care at the end of life

By Bella Madden and Ben Bowers Journal of research in Nursing

<https://doi.org/10.1177/17449871251357097>

'Sorted' is a 'poetic response' from Bella Madden, a lay member of the Palliative and End of Life Care Group in Cambridge: both an interesting a moving poem and an interesting, 'experimental' process.
